From Student to Soldier: Becoming a Human Weapon of War

Speaker: Mr. Tadamasu Iwai

Former Suicide Soldier

DATE: JULY 23, 2008, 7:00 PM

Mr. Tadamasu Iwai, along with his younger brother Tadakuma, served in the Japanese Navy during World War II. In the heat of wartime patriotism and passion, the Iwais felt pressured to compromise their ideals and eventually found themselves supporting the government. The Iwais became officers and joined the Tokko-tai, a regiment of suicide pilots of submarines packed with explosives—essentially to serve as human guidance systems for explosive devices. As officers, they themselves influenced others to also compromise their ideals and follow the national ideology. After the war, they regretted their decisions and actions.

On September 11, 2001, the Iwai brothers watched in horror as the passenger jets were driven into the Twin Towers in New York. Reminded of their own experiences as young men, they had terribly complex feelings about the consequences and effects of the 9/11 attacks.

The Iwais were also angered by organizations and individuals who used a romanticized distortion of their experiences to convince young Japanese people that Japan acted rightly during the war. People such as manga artist Yoshinori Kobayashi used the Kamikaze to promote an “altruistic spirit of selflessness” among Japanese youth—exactly the attitude the Iwai brothers hated and wished to stop.

Spurred by these events and outlooks, the brothers decided to speak out and educate Japanese youths about the realities of their wartime service, lobbying for more truthful accounts in public discussion. Mr. Tadamasu Iwai wishes to tell us what really happened during the war, and how we have responsibility as human beings to maintain our principle even under the pressures of war.
